Pentahexagon, Geodesic Dome Constructed on ECC Campus

Designed and constructed by James Howell, an El Camino College art student, a pentahexagon, geodesic dome with an area of about 415 square feet, is now on display on the El Camino College campus. Prefabricated from fiber-glass and steel, the dome was erected by Howell and an assistant in less than three hours and may be viewed on campus between the Art Building and the Campus Theater.

WORKING FROM Howell's basic structure, Robert Niece, El Camino art instructor, assigned 1961 industrial design students a research project of engineering 46-foot habitable structures encompassing the geodesic design. Ideas began when Niece attended a seminar at Long Beach State College conducted by designer Buckminster Fuller in 1960. Fuller, father of the geo-desic dome, inspired Niece to conduct further research into the practical application of the self-supporting structure.

NIECE submitted the idea to his classes, showing slides of the Fuller seminar, and hours were spent discussing the domes. Hundreds of concepts have been submitted by students working on these projects. Many models done in balsa wood and cardboard triangles are on display in Room A-6 in the Art Building.

HOWELL, taking his pentahexagon model, collaborated with Arthur P. Beale, engineering instructor at El Camino, and they built a 17-foot diameter dome in Beale's back yard.

Public interest soon developed and the building of another dome was soon in progress.

THE STRUCTURE now on display on the El Camino campus has a 23-foot diameter.

Some of the purpose of the display are, according to Niece "to demonstrate the strength, beauty, and elegance of geodesic forms to prove the logic of light-weight prefabrication, and to illustrate one of the major directions being taken by architecture."
